

Freelance Writing: Places That Pay for Content

Freelance Writers can find a voice in many different places. One such place is the content mill. However, writers tend to pursue this source incorrectly. There is a method to finding the right location for your talent.

Content Mills Save Research Time

A content mill lists topics, keywords or themes for a writer to choose. The writer can then build an article for one or more clients who escrow payment at the mill site. This is quite different from other formats, such as:

- Passive income sites
- Revenue-share sites
- Article sell sites

The only source on this list that is worth the time and effort would be the last item - article sale sites. Writers can name their price and sell writing to a willing buyer. The other two options will send you pennies some time down the road.

Sources and Sites

It is very important to know the kind of writing you want to do and the income level you wish to reach and achieve. Books and articles are available in digital and hard copy formats and give insight into the best sources or sites available to content writers.

A copy of my book Directory of Paying Markets for Freelance Writers may prove helpful to writers attempting to locate sites matching their goals. The Table of Contents lists various styles of writing that include articles, blogs, grants, magazines, reviews and short white papers. Amazon, Kindle and Smashwords all carry this title, which is available to libraries as well.
